

Amid Finger Pointing at Russia, US Brings Tanks Back to Cold War Depot

By Andrea Germanos

Region: USA

Global Research, December 19, 2016

Theme: Militarization and WMD, US NATO

War Agenda

Common Dreams 16 December 2016

As President Barack Obama vows that the United States will take "action" in response to the allegations that Russia interfered with the November election, the U.S. army has started to bring tanks back to a Cold War site in the Netherlands as a show of its "commitment to deterrence in Europe."

The U.S. and Dutch military reopened the Eygelshoven site on Thursday. It will contain"strategically prepositioned critical war stock" including M1 Abrams Tanks and M109 Paladin Self-Propelled Howitzers.

"Three years ago, the last American tank left Europe; we all wanted Russia to be our partner," said Lt. Gen. Ben Hodges, head of U.S. Army Europe. "My country is bringing tanks back," and "[w]e are signaling our commitment and demonstrating the ability to prepare," he said.

"That is what Eygelshoven represents. This is the manifestation of 28 nations committed to the security of each other," he said.

Added Dutch Gen. Tom Middendorp, chief defense staff of the Royal Netherlands Army: "We want to make sure we are sending a clear signal to Russia that we will not accept any violation of NATO's territorial integrity."

U.S. Congress earlier this month passed the National Defense Authorization Act, or NDAA, which, as the Wall Street Journal noted, "approved a $3.4 billion spending plan to boost European defenses including reopening or creating five equipment-storage sites in the Netherlands, Poland, Belgium, and two locations in Germany."

NBC News adds:

In September, the U.S. Army began to assemble additional so called Army Prepositioned Stocks (APS) for permanent storage in Europe. The latest shipment includes ammunition.

The additional combat equipment will give the Army the option for another heavy armored brigade. Presently, it has only two light brigades in Europe: 173rd Airborne Brigade and the 2nd Stryker Cavalry Regiment.

Earlier in the year the U.S. had already begun taking steps to confront what the Pentagon described as "an aggressive Russia," and Reuters wrote in October that NATO was prepping for its "biggest military build-up on Russia's borders since the Cold War."

But the restocking of tanks and other equipment at the Dutch site comes as U.S. intelligence officials and politicians have accused Russia of hacking the Democratic National Committee (DNC) computer network and interfering with the 2016 U.S. elections—an accusation repeated by corporate media.

Obama said in an interview with NPR that aired Friday, "I think there is no doubt that when any foreign government tries to impact the integrity of our elections ... we need to take action. And we will—at a time and place of our own choosing. Some of it may be explicit and publicized; some of it may not be."

Agencies were still conducting "a whole range of assessments," and so he couldn't speak to motivations for the alleged hacks. However, Obama said, they "create[d] more problems for the Clinton campaign than it had for the Trump campaign."

As The Intercept's Sam Biddle wrote this week:

the refrain of Russian attribution has been repeated so regularly and so emphatically that it's become easy to forget that no one has ever truly proven the claim. There is strong evidence indicating that Democratic email accounts were breached via phishing messages, and that specific malware was spread across DNC computers. There's even evidence that the attackers are the same group that's been spotted attacking other targets in the past. But again: No one has actually proven that group is the Russian government (or works for it).

President-elect Donald Trump, for his part, has dismissed the accusations and called them "ridiculous," and the Kremlin has denounced them as "ludicrous nonsense."

According to Stephen Cohen, professor emeritus of Russian studies, history, and politics at New York University and Princeton University, "We're in the most dangerous confrontation with Russia since the Cuban missile crisis. It needs to be discussed."

Speaking to Democracy Now! on Thursday, Cohen said that "at the moment, it can't be discussed because of these charges that everybody is a client of [Russian President Vladimir] Putin who disagrees with the mainstream opinion. And it's coming from the Senate. It's coming from The New York Times."

"[O]ne motive is to keep Trump from going to the White House. Another is to delegitimize him before he gets there. But the main motive—and you can hear it clearly—is Trump has said he wants cooperation with Russia, and the war party here that's against that is determined to stop it," he said.

The original source of this article is Common Dreams Copyright © Andrea Germanos, Common Dreams, 2016

Comment on Global Research Articles on our Facebook page

Become a Member of Global Research

Articles by: Andrea Germanos

Disclaimer: The contents of this article are of sole responsibility of the author(s). The Centre for Research on Globalization will not be responsible for any inaccurate or incorrect statement in this article. The Centre of Research on Globalization grants permission to cross-post Global Research articles on community internet sites as long the source and copyright are acknowledged together with a hyperlink to the original Global Research article. For publication of Global Research articles in print or other forms including commercial internet sites, contact: publications@globalresearch.ca www.globalresearch.ca contains copyrighted material the use of which has not always been specifically authorized by the copyright owner. We are making such material available to our readers under the provisions of "fair use" in an effort to advance a better understanding of political, economic and social issues. The material on this site is distributed without profit to those who have expressed a prior interest in receiving it for research and educational purposes. If you wish to use copyrighted material for purposes other than "fair use" you must request permission from the copyright owner.

For media inquiries: publications@globalresearch.ca