

Atlantic Council Podium Used to Force European Allies to March in Step

By Alex Gorka

Global Research, October 23, 2018

Strategic Culture Foundation 21 October 2018

Wess Mitchell, Assistant Secretary of State for European and Eurasian Affairs, the administration's top diplomat focused on Europe and Eurasia, has warned that Europe's energy dependence on Russia is unacceptable for the United States. That official was addressing the Atlantic Council's "Championing the Frontlines of Freedom, Erasing the Grey Zone" event on October 18. According to him, the competition between the great powers has returned to become "the defining geopolitical fact of our time."

Through their lack of vigilance, European and American officials have allowed the growing Russian and Chinese influence in that region to "sneak up on us."

"Western Europeans cannot continue to deepen energy dependence on the same Russia that America defends it against. Or enrich themselves from the same Iran that is building ballistic missiles that threaten Europe," the assistant secretary emphasized. Adding, "It is not acceptable for US allies in central Europe to support projects like Turkstream 2 and maintain cozy energy deals that make the region more vulnerable to the very Russia that these states joined NATO to protect themselves against."

Something else that was highly interesting was his mention of Belarus along with Ukraine and Georgia as allies. The assistant secretary believes that

"[t]he new principle is respect for the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the allies: Ukraine, Georgia and even Belarus. Washington expects states to respect the rights of their neighbors."

This makes one wonder if the Belarusian government knows it has been granted a new status. The official also mentioned Iran, which should not be allowed to sell oil to Europe because it has refused to abandon its ballistic missile program. Washington calls "on our allies to follow our lead and strengthen their laws to better screen foreign investments in their countries for national security threats."

So, the US laws are flawless, its allies are not viewed as equal partners because they must follow America's lead, or, in other words, do what they are told, and it's up to Washington, not the national governments and parliaments, to decide what investments they need and where that money should come from. The leaders of the Central and Eastern European states should find it awkward, being rebuked for having overlooked "the foundational"

Region: Europe

Theme: Intelligence importance of the nation-state and national sovereignty," while allowing unfriendly China and Russia to move in.

"Our allies in Central Europe must not be under any illusions that these powers are their friends," Mr. Mitchell explained.

Obviously, he is quite sure that the governments of these nations are unable to grasp who is their friend and who is not. They are as naïve as small children. It's good that the US is right here ready to enlighten them.

This highly-placed diplomat went on to explain that the United States should be seen as the protector of sovereignty, as it "rejects Russia's territorial aggression against its neighbor Ukraine and [rejects] China's predatory 'debt-mongering' throughout Central and Eastern Europe."

Unlike its rivals, America does not seek dependencies, but rather independent states that should be "willing and able to share the burden of Western defense." So, here is what independence à l'américaine is like, with its friends and allies absolutely free to comply with their protector's instructions offering specific guidance about exactly how much they have to pay for defense, what investments to bring in, who to be friendly with, and how they should properly view the situation in their own region. Whatever happens in Central and Eastern Europe, everything has to revolve around the US.

"The United States has long had a tradition of not interfering in the details of European integration," Mr. Mitchell assured us. Of course, telling the UK PM to sue the EU and thus expedite Brexit can certainly not be seen as interfering in European integration. Suggesting to French President Macron that he take France out of the EU is another example of noninterference. The Assistant Secretary expressed confidence that the allies could "beat back its competitors in Europe" with a little help from their American friends.

Also addressing the Atlantic Council's October 18 conference, US Special Representative for Ukraine, Kurt Volker, revealed that Washington plans to stiffen the sanctions regime against Moscow "every month or two" to make it more amenable over Ukraine. The new policy suggests increasing the sanctions periodically, over time. Those remarks came after Russian President Vladimir Putin told the Valdai Club in Sochi that he hoped that a government more friendly toward Russia emerges from the Ukrainian presidential election that will be held on March 31.

Mr. Volker defied logic. On the one hand, he cited his "estimation... that the chances of their changing position now are lower then they were even a year ago." Nevertheless, the best strategy for the West is to maintain pressure on Moscow through those economic sanctions—i.e., sticking to the very same measures that have proven to be useless, given that the "chances of their changing position now are lower." So, the US and its allies should continue to implement a policy doomed to failure! But the ambassador states,

"I think we need to keep on track. I believe that sanctions do have an impact and we see evidence of that in Russia."

What a bizarre way to convince his listeners!

"This is a shockingly big and important humanitarian catastrophe that no one talks about. We have over 10,000 people killed," exclaimed this official who represents a nation that has just sent Ukraine, a country notorious for the corruption in its military ranks, a shipment of lethal arms so that it can kill more of its own citizens or let the weapons systems fall into the wrong hands and be used to kill other people outside of Ukraine. The "wrong hands" could use those weapons against US military. With this kind of people you never know.

There is no penetrating insight, no reading between the lines, no wasting time on anything like analysis, and no attempts to find the logic in anything that's said — nothing like that is required. It's easy to understand highly-placed US State Department officials. You guys do what you are told, or else. And, just in case, don't forget that your best friend and closest ally overseas carries a big stick to force you to march in step. These speeches are delivered from time to time to ensure that their "dear allies" remember that. The Atlantic Council's podium fits the bill.

*

Note to readers: please click the share buttons above. Forward this article to your email lists. Crosspost on your blog site, internet forums. etc.

Alex Gorka is a defense and diplomatic analyst.

Featured image is from @chastime.

The original source of this article is Strategic Culture Foundation Copyright © Alex Gorka, Strategic Culture Foundation, 2018

Comment on Global Research Articles on our Facebook page

Become a Member of Global Research

Articles by: Alex Gorka

Disclaimer: The contents of this article are of sole responsibility of the author(s). The Centre for Research on Globalization will not be responsible for any inaccurate or incorrect statement in this article. The Centre of Research on Globalization grants permission to cross-post Global Research articles on community internet sites as long the source and copyright are acknowledged together with a hyperlink to the original Global Research article. For publication of Global Research articles in print or other forms including commercial internet sites, contact: publications@globalresearch.ca www.globalresearch.ca contains copyrighted material the use of which has not always been specifically authorized by the copyright owner. We are making such material available to our readers under the provisions of "fair use" in an effort to advance a better understanding of political, economic and social issues. The material on this site is distributed without profit to those who have expressed a prior interest in receiving it for research and educational purposes. If you wish to use copyrighted material for purposes other than "fair use" you must request permission from the copyright owner.

For media inquiries: publications@globalresearch.ca