

US Network TV Covers Liberia's Ebola Crisis - Without Liberian Voices

By Peter Hart

Global Research, November 16, 2014

FAIR 11 November 2014

Theme: Media Disinformation

On 60 Minutes, CBS reporter Lara Logan (11/9/14) presented a dramatic and emotional account of the fight against Ebola at one treatment facility in Liberia. But there was just one problem: Liberians didn't speak on the broadcast.

Former New York Times correspondent Howard French weighed in on Twitter as the broadcast aired, and collected his thoughts on Storify (11/9/14) under the headline "Africa Without Africans, Brought to You by 60 Minutes."

As he put it:

There's a large literature of what's meant by Africa w/out Africans. Common examples come from journalism that quotes just diplomats + aid workers + foreign experts of one kind of another. Usually, they'll throw in a quote from a taxi driver or an anonymous market worker to cover their, you know...

Indeed, the focus of Logan's reporting was the US medical workers who had traveled to Liberia to care for the sick—"more than 2,000 Americans leading the response," anchor Scott Pelley explained in his introduction, "and more on the way." The segment was based on life at one treatment center run by the International Medical Corps, with CBS focusing on the American doctors and nurses treating the sick.

There's no doubt that they are brave; one doctor speaks of the "global citizen's responsibility" to act, and a nurse who speaks very plainly about the chance she could get sick and die: "I'm OK with that, because I'd rather be here helping than home and safe."

But Americans aren't the only ones risking their lives to treat Ebola patients. Logan explained that "most of the staff here are Liberian, and to lift their spirits they mark every new shift with hymns." That narration is accompanied by footage of singing African health workers, while Logan continues:

The stigma of the disease is so great, many of them say they're treated as outcasts when they commute back home every day. But in here, the Americans who work with them call them heroes.

Logan even shows Liberian workers suiting up:

In sweltering heat and often 100 percent humidity, they cover every inch of their bodies in plastic and rubber armor. They're so hard to recognize, they wear their names on their foreheads.

But she sits down with one of the American doctors to ask: "How tough is it wear that suit?"

At one point, Logan expressed a desire to include Liberian voices: "We want to talk to some of the patients, but you have to keep your distance."

There's been plenty of criticism of US media coverage of Ebola for focusing on the slim threat to Americans while thousands of Africans have died. 60 Minutes didn't do that at all. But it represented a different kind of media problem: The show traveled to the scene of the crisis-and chose to portray it through American eyes. As French put it, "It's the erasure of Africans from history, in this case their own history, and to reserve meaningful thought and agency to whites."

The original source of this article is FAIR
Copyright © Peter Hart, FAIR, 2014

---

Comment on Global Research Articles on our Facebook page

Become a Member of Global Research

Articles by: Peter Hart

Disclaimer: The contents of this article are of sole responsibility of the author(s). The Centre for Research on Globalization will not be responsible for any inaccurate or incorrect statement in this article. The Centre of Research on Globalization grants permission to cross-post Global Research articles on community internet sites as long the source and copyright are acknowledged together with a hyperlink to the original Global Research article. For publication of Global Research articles in print or other forms including commercial internet sites, contact: publications@globalresearch.ca www.globalresearch.ca contains copyrighted material the use of which has not always been specifically authorized by the copyright owner. We are making such material available to our readers under the provisions of "fair use" in an effort to advance a better understanding of political, economic and social issues. The material on this site is distributed without profit to those who have expressed a prior interest in receiving it for research and educational purposes. If you wish to use copyrighted material for purposes other than "fair use" you must request permission from the copyright owner.

For media inquiries: publications@globalresearch.ca