In a newly released video clip, Biden disinformation czar Nina Jankowicz demands that "trustworthy verified people" like her be given the power to edit other people's tweets, making Twitter more like Wikipedia.

Yes, really.

Asserting that she was "eligible for it because I'm verified," Jankowicz then bemoaned the fact there are people on Twitter with different opinions to her who also have the blue tick but "shouldn't be verified" because they're "not trustworthy."

"So verified people can essentially start to edit Twitter the same sort of way that Wikipedia is so they can add context to certain tweets," said Jankowicz.

She then provided the example, which she claimed was non-political, of President Trump tweeting about voter fraud.

"Someone could add context from one of the 60 lawsuits that went through the court or something that an election official in one of the states said, perhaps your own Secretary of State and his news conferences, something like that," said Jankowicz.

"Adding context so that people have a fuller picture rather than just an individual claim on a tweet," she added.

Of course, Twitter already slaps warning labels on such tweets, but now Jankowicz wants approved regime propagandists to be empowered to insert their narrative on an individual basis.

Also note how two of the other participants in the conversation were wearing face masks, despite it being a remote Zoom call.

As we previously highlighted, Jankowicz was handed the role of overseeing Biden's 'Ministry of Truth' despite revealing that free speech makes her "shudder" while also promoting the lie that the Hunter Biden laptop story was Russian disinformation.

Jankowicz also ludicrously cited Christopher Steele as an expert on disinformation. Steele was the author of the infamous Clinton campaign-funded Trump 'peegate' dossier' that turned out to be an actual product of disinformation.

But yeah, a person with a proven track record of pushing disinformation and hyper-partisanship should totally be given the power to edit tweets she disagrees with.
