

France Is Reportedly Making a Principled Stand Against NATO's Expansion to Asia

Macron's position isn't driven by the desire to do any favors for President Xi, but is predicated on his assessment of France's national interests.

By Andrew Korybko

Global Research, June 07, 2023

Region: Asia, Europe Theme: Intelligence

All Global Research articles can be read in 51 languages by activating the Translate Website button below the author's name.

To receive Global Research's Daily Newsletter (selected articles), click here.

Click the share button above to email/forward this article to your friends and colleagues. Follow us on Instagram and Twitter and subscribe to our Telegram Channel. Feel free to repost and share widely Global Research articles.

***

The Financial Times cited eight unnamed sources who revealed that France is reportedly preventing the planned opening of NATO's liaison office in Japan. According to them, Macron believes that this move violates the alliance's charter, which limits its geographic reach to the North Atlantic. He's also supposedly against anything that can contribute to NATO-Chinese tensions. The spanner that the French leader unexpected threw into the bloc's Asian expansion plans comes after his trip to China in early April.

He visited the People's Republic along with European Commissioner Von Der Leyen around two weeks after President Xi traveled to Moscow. Upon returning home, Macron revived his prior rhetoric about Europe's strategic autonomy in the New Cold War, specifically saying that the continent should resist American pressure to take its side over Taiwan. Later that month, China's Ambassador to the EU said that his country's cooperation with the continent is as unlimited as its cooperation with Russia.

This sequence of events suggests that Macron's rhetoric was sincere despite many in the Alt-Media Community suspecting that he was just trying to strategically disarm Russia with his words. About that alleged end goal, Kremlin spokesman Peskov confirmed in early June that Moscow doesn't regard Paris as a suitable mediator in the NATO-Russian proxy war due to its direct involvement in it. Nevertheless, there's also no denying that France's reported stand against NATO's Asian expansion is commendable.

That said, Macron's position isn't driven by the desire to do any favors for President Xi, but is predicated on his assessment of France's national interests. In his mind, the bloc's growing involvement on the other side of Eurasia needlessly provokes the People's Republic, which is the EU's top trade partner. Moreover, it could also make it more difficult for NATO to contain Russia in Europe if its members end up dividing their focus between that front and the Asia-Pacific.

Simply put, France has yet to fully abandon the notion of national interests like most of its liberal-globalist European peers have already done, which explains Macron's reported resistance to NATO's plans. His country's different approach to International Relations is likely attributable to its neo-colonial empire in Africa, which is crumbling as a result of Russia's "Democratic Security" inroads there over the past few years but still exists in some form.

No other NATO member has anything comparable, which is why the majority of them are predisposed to complying with the demands of this bloc's US leader even at the expense of their own interests in pursuit of what Washington claims is the "greater good". France might ultimately be pressured by the US and its vassals to such an extent that it's forced to relent on its reported opposition to the bloc's Asian expansion plans, but for now Macron is holding his ground in defense of his country's national interests.

This observation proves that NATO's internecine rifts are naturally occurring, just like the ones that the bloc has with Hungary and Turkiye, and not the result of foreign meddling like the Mainstream Media misleading implies is the case. While it's true that the US exploited its proxy war with Russia to successfully reassert its unipolar hegemony over Europe, it failed to do so completely, and that's why France still has a modicum of sovereignty left to resist NATO's Asian expansion plans (at least for now).

*

Note to readers: Please click the share button above. Follow us on Instagram and Twitter and subscribe to our Telegram Channel. Feel free to repost and share widely Global Research articles.

This article was originally published on Andrew Korybko's Newsletter.

Andrew Korybko is an American Moscow-based political analyst specializing in the relationship between the US strategy in Afro-Eurasia, China's One Belt One Road global vision of New Silk Road connectivity, and Hybrid Warfare. He is a frequent contributor to Global Research.

He is a regular contributor to Global Research.

Featured image is from InfoBrics

The original source of this article is Global Research Copyright © Andrew Korybko, Global Research, 2023

Comment on Global Research Articles on our Facebook page

Become a Member of Global Research

Articles by: Andrew Korybko

About the author:

Andrew Korybko is an American Moscow-based political analyst specializing in the relationship between the US strategy in Afro-Eurasia, China's One Belt One Road global vision of New Silk Road connectivity, and Hybrid Warfare. He is a frequent contributor to Global Research.

Disclaimer: The contents of this article are of sole responsibility of the author(s). The Centre for Research on Globalization will not be responsible for any inaccurate or incorrect statement in this article. The Centre of Research on Globalization grants permission to cross-post Global Research articles on community internet sites as long the source and copyright are acknowledged together with a hyperlink to the original Global Research article. For publication of Global Research articles in print or other forms including commercial internet sites, contact: publications@globalresearch.ca www.globalresearch.ca contains copyrighted material the use of which has not always been specifically authorized by the copyright owner. We are making such material available to our readers under the provisions of "fair use" in an effort to advance a better understanding of political, economic and social issues. The material on this site is distributed without profit to those who have expressed a prior interest in receiving it for research and educational purposes. If you wish to use copyrighted material for purposes other than "fair use" you must request permission from the copyright owner.

For media inquiries: publications@globalresearch.ca