Making a spectacle out of the poor and working class is the newest trend from the mainstream media machine.

The BBC is currently casting for a new show that seeks to pit the unemployed and low-paid workers against one another to win a cash prize.

The contestants will be expected to ‘prove’ themselves, much like those in Suzanne Collins’ hit series The Hunger Games. A representative from the production company elaborated and stated that ‘people will be put to the test in a series of challenges and tasks’.

The BBC are looking for Britain's hardest young worker...

We are looking for people to take part in a new BBC2 competitive series looking for Britain's hardest grafter. We'll be investigating what affects people in the workplace. We want people who feel passionately about the issues in the UK today:

Have you been in and out of work since leaving school?

Are you sick of living off your parents?

Are you losing out on jobs because you've got no experience?

Have you got a degree but not a graduate job?

Whatever the issue, taking part in this project will give you the opportunity prove your abilities through a series of challenges and potentially walk away with a cash prize.

The representative went on to say that 'those who have produced the least will be eliminated', which is particularly frightening in austerity-stricken Britain where cuts to healthcare are truly eliminating people's lives.

The winner will apparently receive £15,000 ($23,000), which is roughly equal to a year's living wage; well, at least it would be outside of London.

Will we need to wait much longer before we are back to gladiatorial arenas with people fighting to the death to earn a living?

Perhaps the production company could have, instead, invested in a show that sought to get low-paid workers into high paying jobs – a real prize – instead of this Hunger Games style spectacle.
