

Mainstream Media Coverage of Humanitarian Crises Falls Short, New Survey Finds

Mainstream media coverage of humanitarian crises is “selective, sporadic, simplistic and partial,” according to a new consumer survey.

By IRIN

Global Research, May 05, 2018

IRIN 1 May 2018

Region: Europe

Theme: Media Disinformation

Respondents indicated widespread dissatisfaction with the quantity and quality of mainstream news coverage and highlighted a desire for more investigative reporting and scrutiny of the aid sector itself.

The in-depth survey was conducted before the widely reported Oxfam UK sexual misconduct scandal by Dr Martin Scott, a senior lecturer in media and international development at the University of East Anglia (UEA), and humanitarian news agency IRIN News.

It investigated how people working or interested in the humanitarian aid sector view global media coverage of humanitarian issues. Does the coverage do justice to critical issues? Does it include sufficient field reporting and reflect subject expertise? What are the main news sources? What impact, if any, does news coverage have on the respondents' professional work?

Many of the 1,626* respondents, who included aid workers, researchers and government officials, said mainstream news coverage concentrates on a small number of crises, thus relegating most crises as ‘neglected’ or ‘forgotten’. More than 70 percent of respondents said the mainstream news media does not offer enough coverage of humanitarian issues. A common complaint was that mainstream news coverage was “sensationalist” and “lacked in-depth analysis”. Reporting of humanitarian issues and crises was frequently referred to as “reductive”, “ cursory”, “simplistic” and “shallow”.

Overall, the most sought after aspect of reporting on humanitarian issues is expert analysis.

“Respondents want more and bolder investigative reporting and more consistent expert analysis of humanitarian issues and crises, including analysis of the aid sector as a whole,” said Dr Scott.

However, many think there is insufficient investigative reporting on the sector.

One reader commented that “bosses are more likely to react to news stories about sexual harassment of and by employees, than to their own employees raising concerns”. That view was echoed by UK International Development Secretary Penny Mordaunt's recent words:

“Remember, we only learned about... the recent Oxfam scandal... from journalists, operating in a free press, in our democratic country.”

Respondents indicated that quality news coverage can play an important role in shaping responses to crises, most commonly by stimulating further research and/or advocacy and by informing organisational or operational priorities.

“These findings show that news coverage of international humanitarian crises matters – and that quality journalism matters,” said IRIN Director Heba Aly. “Readers are yearning for deeper, more meaningful journalism about the challenges our world faces; and when we as media organisations deliver that kind of reporting, we can have real impact. We shouldn’t underestimate the power – nor the responsibility – that we hold.”

Only three mainstream news outlets were mentioned by more than half of the respondents as a key source for news and analysis on humanitarian issues: the BBC, The Guardian and Al Jazeera English. Alongside The New York Times and the Washington Post, these were frequently described as the only “exceptions” to the mainstream news media’s poor coverage of humanitarian crises.

Respondents identified the most popular specialist news providers as Devex, Foreign Policy, IRIN, ReliefWeb, News Deeply, the Thomson Reuters Foundation and UN Dispatch.

Read more about IRIN’s survey results here.

Note

*the majority of respondents were IRIN readers and the results have been interpreted with this in mind.

Survey respondents included individuals working for international NGOs (28%), the United Nations (9%), academia (9%), national or local NGOs (8%), government organisations (8%) and in the corporate sector (5%). A majority of respondents were either mid-career (32%) or senior professionals (41%) and had either “some” (34%) or a “significant” amount (30%) of decision-making authority within their organisations. While most were based in the US or Europe, others worked around the globe, from Mexico to Kenya, at headquarters and in the field.

The survey is part of an ongoing research project into humanitarian journalism. The Humanitarian Journalism project is investigating how the news media report on humanitarian crises, what shapes their coverage and its impact and influence. It is supported by the UK Arts and Humanities Research Council (AHRC). Led by Dr Scott, the research team includes Dr Kate Wright (Edinburgh University) and Dr Mel Bunce (City, University of London).

For further information about the project and to view the survey report “Attitudes towards media coverage of humanitarian issues within the aid sector”, see www.humanitarian-journalism.net

The original source of this article is IRIN
Copyright © IRIN, IRIN, 2018

Comment on Global Research Articles on our Facebook page

Become a Member of Global Research

Articles by: IRIN

Disclaimer: The contents of this article are of sole responsibility of the author(s). The Centre for Research on Globalization will not be responsible for any inaccurate or incorrect statement in this article. The Centre of Research on Globalization grants permission to cross-post Global Research articles on community internet sites as long the source and copyright are acknowledged together with a hyperlink to the original Global Research article. For publication of Global Research articles in print or other forms including commercial internet sites, contact: publications@globalresearch.ca www.globalresearch.ca contains copyrighted material the use of which has not always been specifically authorized by the copyright owner. We are making such material available to our readers under the provisions of "fair use" in an effort to advance a better understanding of political, economic and social issues. The material on this site is distributed without profit to those who have expressed a prior interest in receiving it for research and educational purposes. If you wish to use copyrighted material for purposes other than "fair use" you must request permission from the copyright owner.
For media inquiries: publications@globalresearch.ca