

Margaret Thatcher's Greatest Achievement was Tony Blair and New Labour

Region: Europe

By Jim Kavanagh Global Research, April 12, 2013 Z Communications

Thatcher was absolutely right that her greatest achievement was Tony Blair and New Labor, and — as Obama's encomium makes quite explicit — there's a fine parallel in that her partner, Reagan's, greatest achievement was setting an agenda that Clinton, Obama and the new, "centrist" Democratic Party still carry on. Thatcher-Blair-Brown, Reagan-Clinton-Obama. Hands across the sea. Yes, unfortunately, to this comedy-if-it-weren't-a-tragedy they are still selling tickets.

And, no, I do not accept that one must not "speak ill of the dead" when the deceased is a public figure whose death is the occasion of innumerable, insufferable praiseful elegies to her political legacy. Glenn Greenwald has it right:

That one should not speak ill of the dead is arguably appropriate when a private person dies, but it is wildly inappropriate for the death of a controversial public figure, particularly one who wielded significant influence and political power... the protocols are fundamentally different when it comes to public discourse about the person's life and political acts. ...

[T]hose who admire the deceased public figure (and their politics) aren't silent at all. They are aggressively exploiting the emotions generated by the person's death to create hagiography. ...Demanding that no criticisms be voiced to counter that hagiography is to enable false history and a propagandistic whitewashing of bad acts, distortions that become quickly ossified and then endure by virtue of no opposition and the powerful emotions created by death. When a political leader dies, it is irresponsible in the extreme to demand that only praise be permitted but not criticisms.

There is absolutely nothing wrong with loathing Margaret Thatcher or any other person with political influence and power based upon perceived bad acts, and that doesn't change simply because they die. If anything, it becomes more compelling to commemorate those bad acts upon death as the only antidote against a society erecting a false and jingoistically self-serving history.

So, please, let's not use Margaret Thatcher's death to further extend her legacy, but to insist that it's long past time to pull the plug on its run.

The original source of this article is Z Communications Copyright © Jim Kavanagh, Z Communications, 2013

Comment on Global Research Articles on our Facebook page

Become a Member of Global Research

Articles by: Jim Kavanagh

Disclaimer: The contents of this article are of sole responsibility of the author(s). The Centre for Research on Globalization will not be responsible for any inaccurate or incorrect statement in this article. The Centre of Research on Globalization grants permission to cross-post Global Research articles on community internet sites as long the source and copyright are acknowledged together with a hyperlink to the original Global Research article. For publication of Global Research articles in print or other forms including commercial internet sites, contact: publications@globalresearch.ca www.globalresearch.ca contains copyrighted material the use of which has not always been specifically authorized by the copyright owner. We are making such material available to our readers under the provisions of "fair use" in an effort to advance a better understanding of political, economic and social issues. The material on this site is distributed without profit to those who have expressed a prior interest in receiving it for research and educational purposes. If you wish to use copyrighted material for purposes other than "fair use" you must request permission from the copyright owner.

For media inquiries: publications@globalresearch.ca