In a statement, Yoon remarked that South Korea aims to incorporate national companies into projects such as the $500 billion NEOM smart city project northwest of Saudi Arabia, as well as expand nuclear energy cooperation.

"In particular, [MbS] said he would like to drastically strengthen cooperation with South Korea in the areas of the defense industry, infrastructure, and construction," Yoon's office disclosed.

Among the agreements, Korea Electric Power Corp (KEPCO) and four other Korean firms signed a memorandum of understanding with Saudi Arabia's Public Investment Fund to build and operate a hydrogen and ammonia production plant in the Saudi kingdom, the company said.

Saudi Arabian oil giant Aramco also said it plans to invest $7 billion in South Korea's petrochemical project.

MbS is currently on a tour of East Asia, having previously stopped in Indonesia to participate in G20. The crown prince will visit Thailand and Japan next to discuss energy and bilateral cooperation, according to state-run news outlet Al Riyadh.

As a result of Washington's strained relationship with the kingdom after the OPEC decision to cut its oil production by 2 million barrels per day, Saudi Arabia has decided to lean eastwards for economic expansion.

In October, the Chinese Foreign Ministry expressed China's support for the expansion of the BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China, South Africa) strategic alliance. Earlier, South African President Cyril Ramaphosa said that MbS expressed a desire to join the group.
