Now that Madiba is dead...

beware the icon makers they will say he was great they will laud his calls for peace they will wring their hands and cry speaking only of the man disregarding the people explaining away the movement pretending the revolution was won they will deny their guilt denying their privilege obscuring his birth in the pains and the blood of his people denying the capital crimes of neoliberal friends of apartheid still alive now that Mandela is dead they will say no one else will come they will wink that we still organize they will pretend that de Klerk was his friend they will ignore the birth pangs in Jo'burg today pretending to honor him with deceitful silence in the face of Capetown shanties and Manenburg misery and Durban oppression while former murderers still prev and bougie negros still play while lying bishops still pray and corporations still rape and the people in South Africa still die like people across the Global South as the Revolution dies as Madiba's children live in squalor as the wine growers awake in shacks as the homeless sleep beneath the floors of stores—after hours when they will not be seen while they are still being sold beware the speakers of phrases that lie they will disremember liberation struggles that have yet to be won they will pretend that Mandela belonged to them denying the people to whom he belonged remember to remember Chris Hani remember to remember Robben Island remember to remember the South African Charter remember to remember that icons created by oppressors will never liberate the people remember to remember that they are still killing Martin remember to remember that they are still killing Malcolm remember to remember that Assata still lives remember to remember that our liberation will be sold to us for profits unless we work for it with our minds and our actions then we will remember Mandela as he was for he will live inside us and the lies will no longer deceive because the struggle will continue and the last will be first at last
