

Sudan's "Deep State" War Could Have Far-Reaching Geostrategic Consequences If It Continues

By Andrew Korybko

Global Research, April 17, 2023

Region: Middle East & North Africa

Theme: Intelligence

All Global Research articles can be read in 51 languages by activating the Translate Website button below the author's name.

To receive Global Research's Daily Newsletter (selected articles), click here.

Click the share button above to email/forward this article to your friends and colleagues. Follow us on Instagram and Twitter and subscribe to our Telegram Channel. Feel free to repost and share widely Global Research articles.

Seeing as how Egypt, Ethiopia, Russia, the UAE, and the US all have important interests in Sudan, it's clear that this latest African conflict could indeed have far-reaching consequences if it continues and especially if its "deep state" war descends into a civil war. In that event, this geostrategic country could suddenly become an object of intense competition in the New Cold War, which could catalyze uncontrollable processes that culminate in destabilizing all of Africa. All responsible stakeholders must therefore do their utmost to prevent that from happening.

Fierce fighting broke out all across Sudan this weekend between the Sudanese Armed Forces (SAF) and the Rapid Support Forces (RSF), with each blaming the other for starting this. Seeing as how this conflict remains limited for the time being to two military factions, it can therefore be described as a "deep state" war and not a civil one like the conflict that ultimately resulted in South Sudan's independence. This doesn't mean that it won't turn into a civil war, but just that it hadn't yet by Sunday evening.

Sudan's "deep state" war was inevitable though since these factions have been competing with each other over who'll remain the country's most powerful force amidst its continually delayed transition to democracy that began after 2019's military coup. The SAF is led by Chief General Abdel Fattah Al-Burhan while the RSF is run by General Mohamed Hamdan Dagalo, who's also known as Hemedti. Both men are part of the Transitional Sovereign Council, the first as president and the second as deputy chairman.

A new prime minister and institutions of the transitional authority were supposed to have been announced by last Tuesday, but that obviously didn't happen. "Deep state" tensions started becoming uncontrollable around that time, perhaps due to one or both parties calculating that they can make their long-planned power play against the other on the pretext of presenting it as a "defense of democracy" against their allegedly "anti-democratic" opponent.

It's difficult to discern exactly what's happening right now and who controls what due to the "fog of war" so the present piece will avoid touching upon unconfirmed information in analyzing Sudan's "deep state" war, instead focusing on the consequences of this entirely predictable development. For starters, this conflict reflects very poorly on the military since it shows how deeply divided it's become over the years that two clearly distinct competing centers of power were able to emerge within it.

Depending on how long they war with each other, this institution might become depleted enough to the point where separatist forces reemerge along its periphery as a potent threat to Sudan's territorial integrity, which could turn it into the next Yugoslavia. Former President Omar Al-Bashir even warned his Russian counterpart about this during their meeting in 2017 when he requested assistance in averting what he said was "the US desire to divide Sudan into five states".

That scenario hasn't yet unfolded due to the military remaining a formidable force despite its growing divisions since then, which culminated in Sudan's inevitable "deep state" war this weekend, but everything could quickly change if their conflict continues raging on. The longer that these factions fight, the more likely it is that some level of foreign intervention could occur as well, particularly the possibility of Egypt supporting Burhan and the UAE backing Hemedti, who they're each considered close with.

Even though Emirati President Mohammed bin Zayed (MBZ) just met his Egyptian counterpart Abdel Fattah El-Sisi in Cairo last week, those two could quickly turn to propping up their respective partners if the conflict continues dragging on in order to give them an edge over the other. Regarding Egypt's role, the RSF captured some of its troops in the country, which Cairo claims were there to conduct joint training. They'll be returned, but few even knew they were there in the first place until this happened.

Neighboring Ethiopia, with whom Egypt and Sudan are embroiled in a bitter dispute over a dam on the Nile that runs through each of their territories, will certainly take note of this as well as footage on social media claiming to show Egyptian fighter jets in Sudan too. There have been concerns for a couple years already that Egypt is plotting a so-called "preemptive strike" against Ethiopia in order to stop Addis from filling that aforesaid dam, the speculation of which was now extended credence by this revelation.

Ethiopia and Sudan are also in a dispute over a region known as Alfashaga, which led to clashes last summer, so it's possible that Addis could make a military move there in support of its claims should it sense that Khartoum is too divided and weak to retain control over it. To be absolutely clear, there aren't any signs that this is being considered, but it's still worth mentioning in the larger context of the consequences that could unfold if Sudan's "deep state" war continues.

This latest conflict is also of interest to Ethiopia because its optics very closely resemble the recent dispute between the federal government and some elements in the Amhara Region over the country's military reorganization. Chief of General Staff Birhanu Julia announced on Saturday that "Starting from today, the regional special forces structure is no longer there. Our work has been finished", so federal supporters might claim that this successful operation prevented a Sudanese-like "deep state" war.

It's not just the US, Egypt, the UAE, and Ethiopia whose interests are affected by this conflict, but Russia too, who's grown extremely close to both warring military factions after building upon the ties that former President Bashir established during his previously mentioned trip to Moscow in 2017. It plans to open a naval base in Port Sudan sometime soon, the two sides reportedly cooperate on mining and security, and Sudan facilitates Russian access to the neighboring Central African Republic (CAR).

The Kremlin doesn't care which side wins as long as the victor retains their strategic ties, the last dimension of which is immensely important since any potential impediment to Russia's trans-Sudanese access to the CAR could have disastrous consequences for that country's security. Moscow helped Bangui restore its sovereign writ over large swathes of the country with Wagner's help, but the capital could once again be threatened by rebels if the Kremlin can't adequately resupply those two's forces.

The possible collapse of Russia's "Democratic Security" project there would have massive implications for its newfound appeal to African countries, which is due to the combination of it effectively bolstering its partners' sovereignty via the means pioneered in the CAR and its attractive multipolar worldview. The possible reversal of its first "Democratic Security" success on the continent as a result of the Sudanese "deep state" war would represent a significant symbolic setback that the West would certainly exploit.

With these five states' interests in mind, it's clear that this latest African conflict could indeed have far-reaching consequences if it continues and especially if Sudan's "deep state" war descends into a civil war. In that event, this geostrategic country could suddenly become an object of intense competition in the New Cold War, which could catalyze uncontrollable processes that culminate in destabilizing all of Africa. All responsible stakeholders must therefore do their utmost to prevent that from happening.

*

Note to readers: Please click the share button above. Follow us on Instagram and Twitter and subscribe to our Telegram Channel. Feel free to repost and share widely Global Research articles.

This article was originally published on Andrew Korybko's Newsletter.

Andrew Korybko is an American Moscow-based political analyst specializing in the relationship between the US strategy in Afro-Eurasia, China's One Belt One Road global vision of New Silk Road connectivity, and Hybrid Warfare. He is a frequent contributor to Global Research.

He is a regular contributor to Global Research.

Featured image is from the author

The original source of this article is Global Research
Copyright © Andrew Korybko, Global Research, 2023

Comment on Global Research Articles on our Facebook page

Become a Member of Global Research

Articles by: Andrew Korybko

About the author:

Andrew Korybko is an American Moscow-based political analyst specializing in the relationship between the US strategy in Afro-Eurasia, China's One Belt One Road global vision of New Silk Road connectivity, and Hybrid Warfare. He is a frequent contributor to Global Research.

Disclaimer: The contents of this article are of sole responsibility of the author(s). The Centre for Research on Globalization will not be responsible for any inaccurate or incorrect statement in this article. The Centre of Research on Globalization grants permission to cross-post Global Research articles on community internet sites as long the source and copyright are acknowledged together with a hyperlink to the original Global Research article. For publication of Global Research articles in print or other forms including commercial internet sites, contact: publications@globalresearch.ca www.globalresearch.ca contains copyrighted material the use of which has not always been specifically authorized by the copyright owner. We are making such material available to our readers under the provisions of "fair use" in an effort to advance a better understanding of political, economic and social issues. The material on this site is distributed without profit to those who have expressed a prior interest in receiving it for research and educational purposes. If you wish to use copyrighted material for purposes other than "fair use" you must request permission from the copyright owner.

For media inquiries: publications@globalresearch.ca