

Vaccine Passports Are Just a Way for the Regime to Expand Its Power

By Ryan McMaken

Global Research, May 07, 2021

Mises Institute 3 May 2021

Theme: Police State & Civil Rights

All Global Research articles can be read in 51 languages by activating the "Translate Website" drop down menu on the top banner of our home page (Desktop version). Visit and follow us on Instagram at @crg_globalresearch.

***

Earlier this month, the conservative magazine known as The Spectator published an article with the absurd title "The Libertarian Case for Vaccine Passports." The online version now bears the title "Vaccine Passports Are a Ticket to Freedom," but the physical print version is perhaps more descriptive of what the author is trying to do.

The libertarian case for vaccine passports In principle I'm in favour of vaccination passports, and don't understand how again in principle — anyone could of the right of each of us 'to choose his own path to the everlasting bonfire'. Libertarian to be against them. Let me offer a few end anism has tended to be associated with the where we can guess on which side of the state of the right of each of us 'to choose his own path to the everlasting bonfire'. Libertarian to be against them. Let me offer a few end anism has tended to be associated with the passports, and don't understand how — again in principle — anyone could be against the theory. One can have severe doubts about whether our NHS, pubs, theatres, sports grounds and restaurants would actually be capable of operating such a scheme, yet at the same time think it would be an excellent thing if they were. To me it eems not just sensible and fair but obvious hat access to jobs or spaces where there is n enhanced risk of viral transmission might restricted to people who could demontrate a high degree of immunity.

I'd add that in order for the idea to com-path to the everlasting bonfire'. Libertarianism has tended to be associated with the right rather than the left in politics, not least because in the perennial debate about how far the state should leave the citizen to sink or swim, the libertarian favours the 'sink or swim' tendency.

There exists a scratchy marriage of convenience between those on the right who really do believe in personal freedom, and those who believe in low taxes and a small state. There's convenient overlap between the two, of course. Some right-wingers, opposing measures that extend the apparatus and the reach of the state, profess to do so on 'lib-be against them. Let me offer a few es where we can guess on which side of ment a libertarian would often fal libertarians were against legislation it compulsory for motorcyclists to mets. Most (including me, at the tir against compulsory seat belts. Maning me) would support assisted dy (not all) are pro-choice in the debate. And there is a strong libert against the prohibition of recreations.

Some of these arguments eccentric than others, and many able to those on the left as well a in politics. But there's one strand

The author, a former Conservative politician named Matthew Parris, apparently believes that the forever lockdowns are an inescapable feature of reality, and that the only way around them is for the regime to enact a vaccine passport scheme. For Parris, covid lockdowns are just a force of nature, like gravity. Now, if only we could find a way to get around these nature-imposed lockdowns!

By now the flaw in Parris's logic should be clear. There is nothing natural or inescapable about lockdowns. They are an invention of the state. They are so unnatural, in fact, that they require the use of the state's police powers to enforce them. They require policemen, handcuffs, courts, prisons, and fines to ensure they are followed. Those who ignore this supposed "force of nature"—and these scofflaws are many—must be punished.

All of this escapes Parris's notice, however.

For example, his article begins this way:

In principle I'm in favour of vaccination passports, and don't understand how—again in principle—anyone could be against the theory....

In other words, Parris's position—in his mind, at least—is so correct and so commonsensical that he can't even comprehend how someone would disagree with him.

This, of course, is always a highly suspect way to begin an article. Any intellectually serious political commentator, if he tries a bit, can at least imagine why others might disagree with him. After decades in government, however, Parris is so enamored of the idea that the regime ought to control your every move that any another option is apparently beyond the pale of rational thinking.

Parris goes on:

To me it seems not just sensible and fair but obvious that access to jobs or spaces where there is an enhanced risk of viral transmission might be restricted to people who could demonstrate a high degree of immunity.

There is absolutely nothing libertarian about delaying the lifting of lockdown for everybody, just because it wouldn't be safe for somebody.

Again, note the core assumption: the regime must tell you where you are allowed to go and what you are allowed to do. It is those dastardly libertarians who are the ones "delaying the lifting of lockdowns." For Parris, politicians have been working hard to find a way that society can be set free. These noble policymakers discovered vaccine passports. At long last, people can be allowed to leave their homes. But those libertarians now stand in the way!

Unlike those libertarians, Parris assures us he is in favor of people leaving their homes and visiting each other in public gathering places. It's just that his hands were tied before. There were no options available to him other than keeping you locked up. Now, dear taxpayer, won't you let Parris and his friends set you free? They want you to be free. It's just that there's nothing they can do until you embrace vaccine passports!

If you're noticing that Parris sounds a bit like an abusive husband, you wouldn't be far off. Just as an abuser tells his wife, "See what you made me do!" after he punches her in the face for burning the toast, we see a similar attitude from the vaccine passport crowd: "You see what you're making me do? I want to let you out of your house, but you refuse to submit to our oh-so-libertarian passport system!"

Yet Parris is not alone in this sort of thinking. Many others continue to advocate for vaccine passports as some sort of profreedom scheme. Passports are being framed as an "easing of restrictions."

But, as epidemiologist Martin Kulldorff and Stanford physician Jay Bhattacharya pointed out this month in the Wall Street Journal, there is nothing in the passport scheme that is geared toward lessening regime control of our daily lives. On the contrary, it is all about extending and increasing regime power. Kulldorff and Bhattacharya write:

The idea is simple: Once you've received your shots, you get a document or phone app, which you flash to gain entry to previously locked-down venues—restaurants, theaters, sports arenas, offices, schools.

It sounds like a way of easing coercive lockdown restrictions, but it's the opposite. To see why, consider dining. Restaurants in most parts of the U.S. have already reopened, at limited capacity in some places. A vaccine passport would prohibit entry by potential customers who haven't received their shots....

Planes and trains, which have continued to operate throughout the pandemic, would suddenly be off-limits to the unvaccinated....

The vaccine passport should therefore be understood not as an easing of restrictions but as a coercive scheme to encourage vaccination....

Naturally, the regime claims this is all "required" by "science," but [t]he idea that everybody needs to be vaccinated is as scientifically baseless as the idea that nobody does. Covid vaccines are essential for older, high-risk people and their caretakers and advisable for many others. But those who've been infected are already immune. The young are at low risk, and children—for whom no vaccine has been approved anyway—are at far less risk of death than from the flu. If authorities mandate vaccination of those who don't need it, the public will start questioning vaccines in general.

"Science" mandates nothing as a matter of public policy. Rather, it is policymakers—backed by the violent power of the state—who impose mandates. These are policy choices, not forces of nature. Moreover, as Kulldorff and Bhattacharya note, these aren't even prudent policy choices, and are based on questionable conclusions wrought from scientific data. The authors continue:

Most of those endorsing the idea belong to the laptop class—privileged professionals who worked safely and comfortably at home during the epidemic. Millions of Americans did essential jobs at their usual workplaces and became immune the hard way. Now they would be forced to risk adverse reactions from a vaccine they don't need. Passports would entice young, low-risk professionals, in the West and the developing world, to get the vaccine before older, higher-risk but less affluent members of society. Many unnecessary deaths would result.

But we know how the regime will justify mandatory vaccine policies to themselves should some be injured by adverse reactions. "We had no choice!" the politicians will insist. "Science forced our hand!" This is a convenient way for politicians to weasel out of responsibility for forcing much of the population—much of it a low-risk population—into submitting to certain state-mandated medical procedures. But lest we take too cynical a view, it's entirely possible these people are true believers. Like Parris, the policymakers forcing these policies on citizens and taxpayers might not be able to comprehend any other course of action. This level of moral certitude is a certain privilege of the ruling class, and it certainly has nothing to do with "science."

*

Note to readers: Please click the share buttons above or below. Follow us on Instagram, @crg_globalresearch. Forward this article to your email lists. Crosspost on your blog site, internet forums, etc.

Featured image is from Pixabay

The original source of this article is Mises Institute Copyright © Ryan McMaken, Mises Institute, 2021

Comment on Global Research Articles on our Facebook page

Become a Member of Global Research

Articles by: Ryan McMaken

Disclaimer: The contents of this article are of sole responsibility of the author(s). The Centre for Research on Globalization will not be responsible for any inaccurate or incorrect statement in this article. The Centre of Research on Globalization grants permission to cross-post Global Research articles on community internet sites as long the source and copyright are acknowledged together with a hyperlink to the original Global Research article. For publication of Global Research articles in print or other forms including commercial internet sites, contact: publications@globalresearch.ca www.globalresearch.ca contains copyrighted material the use of which has not always been specifically authorized by the copyright owner. We are making such material available to our readers under the provisions of "fair use" in an effort to advance a better understanding of political, economic and social issues. The material on this site is distributed without profit to those who have expressed a prior interest in receiving it for research and educational purposes. If you wish to use copyrighted material for purposes other than "fair use" you must request permission from the copyright owner.

For media inquiries: publications@globalresearch.ca