What has really brought most non-terrorist groups to negotiate a path to peace?

What are the prospects for Syria to maintain its sovereignty in the face of Western threats of regime change and massive bombing campaigns?

The mainstream U.S. and Canadian media present only half the facts about this war-torn country, and too often it is the wrong half.

Independent journalist Eva Bartlett is from Fergus, Ontario and has visited Syria and covered the war there on six separate occasions since 2014, including two months in summer 2016 and one month at the end of 2016. She writes for and speaks on different media outlets but always maintains her blog, In Gaza, which she started some years ago while living for a period of three years in Gaza.

This talk is intended to help clear up any confusion about what actually transpired during the liberation of Aleppo, in particular, and during the past five years in Syria, in general.
